Selecting a Forester

Introduction

The decisions that New Hampshire's private landowners make regarding how their forests are managed are crucial to this vital resource. Forests cover 84% of our landscape. They provide us with clean water, scenic beauty areas for recreation and wildlife habitat. They also provide raw materials to support the third largest industry in the state, the forest products industry.

Most of the forest land in our state, more than 75% in fact, is privately owned. The majority of New Hampshire's forest landowners don't have the experience, technical training or time necessary to adequately manage their forest resources. Fortunately, there is a large group of professional foresters in the state available to provide a variety of forest resource management services. The state requires individuals who provide forestry services for compensation to be licensed in order to maintain a high standard of forestry practices.

Forest management is a flexible science that, to a certain extent, is governed by the goals and needs of the landowner. Clear communication of the goals to the forester will help ensure the desired results. It is very important landowners take time to establish reasonable objectives and priorities before contacting a licensed forester. Landowners should consider and rank the following: forest and wildlife habitat improvement, income generation, aesthetics, development of recreational opportunities, protection of water quality, and tax considerations.

The qualifications, experience and services offered by foresters vary. Landowners should ask questions about a forester's training and experience to be certain the individual will satisfactorily accomplish their management goals. It's also a good practice to ask for and investigate references. Contacting other landowners with similar management goals will provide information about the capabilities of prospective foresters and valuable insights into the results of forest resource management activities.

Foresters who provide assistance to landowners are frequently categorized as consulting or industrial foresters. Consulting foresters are either self-employed or work for a consulting forestry firm, while industrial foresters are generally employed by a specific forest industry/firm and most often have some responsibility to purchase raw material for their employer.

A written contract or work order is recommended. It should include a description of the services to be provided, an expected time frame for the services to be accomplished, and fees. The fees and method of payment charged for forestry services vary with the type of management service provided. For instance, tree marking fees and commissions based on the gross receipts of timber sales are common timber sale-related, billing procedures. Other services might be charged on a set fee per acre or hourly rate. Some foresters provide services through industrially-sponsored landowner assistance programs where service costs may be offset by the reduced stumpage prices.

Forester Licensing Laws

The Forester Licensing Law RSA 310-A:103, addresses the issue of fees and their disclosure, and requires that "...when dealing with the public, forester shall:

- Identify clearly themselves, their employer, and in whose interest they are working.
- Disclose fully any financial or purchase interest they or their employer may have in the land or timber which they are working.
- Disclose fully all direct or indirect costs or obligations of services provided, including hourly or daily rates and commissions, as well as exclusive contracts to sell forest products to certain individuals or firms.
- Provide complete services requested by landowners or disclose clearly that such services cannot be provided.

Services

Foresters provide a variety of services to landowners including management plan preparation, timber appraisals, timber sale administration, wildlife habitat improvement, boundary marking, timber stand improvement, and recreation and aesthetic improvements. In addition, some foresters may have particular qualifications and interest in providing assistance in land surveying, urban forestry and landscape, Christmas trees, taxation, legal or other natural resource-related matters.

Federal cost-share programs are available to forest landowners for accomplishing conservation-related practices. These include programs to help defray the costs of management plans, wildlife habitat, timber stand improvement activities, and trail and access road construction. Many foresters utilize these programs for their clients and provide assistance with the application process and related paper work.

Management Plans

Landowners seriously interested in the long-term management of their forestland and its resources are encouraged to develop written management plans. Written management plans are valuable documents landowners can refer to in their tenure as stewards of the forest resources. A plan should provide information about the past uses of the land, its current condition and recommendations and options for meeting landowner goals. The value of management plans to landowners is well documented. They are now mandatory requirements of the Tree Farm and Stewardship Programs. Plans are also needed for current-use stewardship documentation purposes for lowering forest land assessment.

Management plans may vary in sophistication from a short report based on a brief walk-through of the woodland to a detailed document which may include wildlife habitat and forest resources inventories, computer-simulated growth projections, and year-by-year schedules of activities with projected costs and/or income. Whatever the level of sophistication desired, it's important landowners have plans developed that are easily read documents accurately reflecting their goals and needs. If a written management plan is desirable, be sure to ask prospective foresters about their experience in writing plans, and examine their work.

Appraisals

Done separately or incorporated into a detailed management plan, timber appraisals are estimated of the quality, volume and value of the wood products currently growing in a parcel of forestland. An appraisal of timber-related assets is useful for determining estimated timber sale revenues, real estate values, estate planning, and federal income tax purposes. Appraisals are often required for permanent land protection efforts such as conservation easements and are useful for planning forest management activities.

Timber appraisals can be done at different levels of accuracy which are reflected in the cost. These can range from a very rough estimate based on a quick walk-through, to a detailed inventory and analysis based on carefully measured plots distributed throughout the woodland.

Wildlife Habitat Improvement

Many of New Hampshire's forest landowners have strong interests in maintaining, enhancing or creating wildlife habitats on their property. Wildlife habitat improvement practices include a wide assortment of management options. While these most often complement traditional forest improvement practices, wildlife habitat emphasis may employ land management practices specifically designed to improve or create wildlife habitat(s). Landowners with a special interest in wildlife management may want to inquire about an individual's training, experience and interest when selecting a forester.

Boundary Marking

Foresters are often called upon to maintain the location of property boundaries. While only a New Hampshire Licensed Land Surveyor can establish boundaries common to another owner, a forester can remark established boundaries, research deeds and help to determine if surveying work is required. Some licensed foresters are also licensed land surveyors.

Timber Stand Improvement

Timber stand improvement (TSI) is a term applied to a variety of silvicultural (forest care) practices used to improve the growing conditions and quality of trees. These include weeding and thinning in young forest stands, pruning of potential crop trees, tree planting and soil scarification for natural regeneration. Foresters often perform TSI work for landowners or may arrange to have the work completed through other contractors.

Timber Sales

Timber sales present an opportunity for landowners to generate income and improve or modify their forests to meet their management goals. While timber harvesting can be a valuable management tool, it's important for landowners to keep in mind timber harvesting has long lasting affects on all aspects of the forest environment. The decisions made regarding how a harvest is done are often the most important management activities made by landowners in their term of ownership. The next section of this booklet deals with this matter in detail.

Foresters prepare and monitor timber sales in a number of ways. The steps taken will depend on the management goals of the landowner, the forest products harvested and their relative value. Landowners should expect a forester will, as a minimum, designate the harvest area, enter them into a legally binding contract with a reputable logging contractor, and provide some level of supervision of the harvest. More intensely prepared and supervised timber sales involve:

- pre-harvest marking, measurement and volume estimated of trees to be harvested
- preparation of harvest contracts including details of utilization specifications, down payments, performance bonds and payment schedules
- compliance and assistance with timber tax and other permitting requirements
- layout of skid trails, wetland crossings and landing sites
- showing and sealed bid procedures for awarding contracts
- showing and sealed bid procedures for awarding contracts
- a higher level of timber harvest supervision
- assistance with income tax reporting

A clear understanding of what level of services will be provided is essential when selecting a forester to assist with a timber sale.

Recreation and Aesthetic Improvements

Foresters often provide assistance with recreation and aesthetics improvements by combining these objectives with soundly applied forest management practices. Recreation trails can be developed for hiking, cross-country skiing and horseback riding by improving the skid trails used during timber harvests. Access roads constructed through cost-share programs often serve as recreation trails as well. Aesthetic improvements may be accomplished by patch cutting to create views, cleaning and seeding log landings after timber harvests, lopping slash and clearing and seeding skid trails, modifying timber harvests to protect or create aesthetically pleasing stands, or thinning areas adjacent to homes to make them more attractive.

Timber Sale Guidelines

The term "timber sale" is used to refer to any significant harvest of wood products involving an exchange of monies. Timber sales may involve sales of trees used to make lumber (sawtimber), fuelwood, whole tree chips, pulp, or any combination of these products.

A decision to harvest timber is a very critical one and should be handled as a business venture. Timber sales often culminate 50 or more years of investment in the form of taxes and management costs and have immediate and long-lasting effects on the future of all of the natural resources and amenities. Proper harvesting can provide multiple benefits: income, improved wildlife habitat, recreational access, views, and healthy and vigorous forests. Uncontrolled, exploitive cutting reduces such values, leads to environmental degradation, public resentment and legal entanglements. Your motives for selling timber should be based on informed decisions with a foundation of good stewardship of your forest and its related resources.

Before You Decide to Sell Timber

The following questions should be considered BEFORE selling timber. If you can't answer these questions or if you respond negatively to them, you will benefit a great deal by seeking professional assistance before initiating a timber sale.

- Have you identified your long-term management objectives such as income, wildlife habitat, recreation, and aesthetics?
- Have you developed a plan to achieve your objectives?
- Have you identified your objectives for this sale?
- What harvest method is best suited to meet your objectives?
- What affect will a harvest of this type have on your forest and its related resources?
- Do you know what your forest will look like following a harvest?
- Will the harvest leave an improved stand for increased value growth?
- Have you consulted with all parties having legal interest in your land (co-owners, mortgagees, banks, etc.)?
- What laws relate to timber harvesting on your land?
- What products are saleable from your land (whole tree chips, fuelwood, pulpwood, boltwood, sawlogs, veneer)?
- What is the anticipated volume to be harvested?
- What is your timber worth by species, product and quality?
- How will you be paid?
- Do you know how stumpage values are determined?
- Are your boundaries clearly identified?
- Have you identified sensitive areas on your land?
- Who is a reliable logging contractor?
- Are you familiar with timber harvesting insurance regulations and your liability?
- Are you familiar with preparation of a timber sale agreement?
- Who is responsible for payment of the NH Yield Tax?

- Will there be adequate supervision of the harvest?
- Do you have the information you need regarding federal tax treatment of timber income?

Who Can Help?

Unfortunately, many people proceed with timber sales without a clear understanding of the process and without getting professional forest management advice and guidance in advance. Assistance is available to landowners from both the public and private sectors. UNH Cooperative Extension foresters in each county are available at no charge to assist with a preliminary assessment of the situation and provide information and educational assistance to help guide landowners through the timber sale process. This may include helping to identify landowner harvest objectives and motives, and perhaps examining the property. This will help match individual harvest objectives with the resource needs and capabilities. Since their role is educational, Extension foresters have limitations on the time and effort that can be expended. They will often recommend retaining the services of a private licensed forester to assist owners with the administration of a timber sale.

Private licensed foresters assist with timber sales in a number of ways. They can, depending on your goals:

- identify property and sale boundary areas
- mark the trees to be cut
- estimate products, volumes and value of marked trees
- lay out skid trails, landings and wetland crossings
- advertise for and receive bids on your behalf
- take care of permit requirements (intent-to-cut, etc.)
- locate a reputable logging contractor
- negotiate fair stumpage values with the logging contractor
- prepare a written contract between you and the buyer
- obtain down payments and performance bonds for you
- supervise the logging operation
- assist with tax reporting

Timber harvests conducted under the supervision of licensed foresters are much more likely to achieve your management goals, will often generate higher stumpage prices than those achieved through direct negotiations with logging contractors, and will leave an improved forest poised for additional management. Increased revenue and better attainment of landowner management goals are benefits that outweigh costs associated with the assistance of a licensed forester in timber sale administration. Consulting fees for timber sale administration depend on the extent of service and the value of products being sold. Tree marking fees and commissions based on gross receipts of timber sales are common timber sale related, billing procedures.

Why Do You Want To Harvest?

Perhaps the first step in a well ordered timber sale project is to consider what your management goals are and begin to develop priorities based on them. You may have been approached by timber buyers or logging contractors, or perhaps you feel pressured by a need for money. Avoid hasty decisions and take time to think through why you want to harvest and get objective non-biased assistance so you can make informed choices on how to proceed.

Consider what you hope to accomplish by having a timber sale. Keep in mind compromises are likely if objectives conflict. Your objectives might include any combination of or all of the following:

- forest improvement
- access and recreational improvement
- wildlife habitat improvement
- land conversion for other uses
- maximum income
- tax considerations
- increased earning power and future value growth

How is Timber Sold

Stumpage Sale

Most timber marketed in New Hampshire is sold by way of stumpage sales in which the value of the trees is given as they exist in the woods or "on the stump." Stumpage value is the value associated with standing timber. Stumpage values offered for a specific timber sale at a given time depend upon market conditions, the total timber sale volume, the species and quality of the stumpage being sold, accessibility, and the seller's knowledge.

Payment for stumpage is usually made in one of two methods. Each has advantages and disadvantages. The timber may be paid for by unit of volume (per thousand board feet, per cord or per ton). Timber sold in this way is paid for as it is removed and the scale (measurement of the product) delivered to the mill is accepted as the standard for payment. Records of delivery are kept on mill scale slips. Landowners conducting their own timber sale should request copies of mill scale slips, particularly if they don't have a preharvest estimate of the volume of timber being harvested. Scale slips are the only concrete evidence of the actual volume of timber removed. Timber may also be sold by what is referred to as a "lump sum" sale. Payment in this method is based on an agreed upon estimate of the total stumpage value. This timber sale method is best applied when an accurate preharvest volume estimate is made. Lump sum payments may be made prior to the start of a harvest or by installment payments made at agreed upon intervals during the course of the harvest. Since the total amount of money is fixed in a lump sum sale, it's very important landowners know the value of their standing timber before entering into a lump sum sale agreement. There are also different federal tax laws that apply to lump-sum sales.

Roadside Sale

Roadside sale is a term used when a landowner either harvests the timber or contracts to have the logging done and sells the timber at a location accessible to a truck. Payment and measurement is most often made on the basis of mill scale though it can also be done where the timber is picked up.

Delivered

Landowners are paid a delivered price when, at their expense, they are responsible for the harvesting and transportation to the mill. Mill scale would be the basis for payment. This is commonly termed "contract logging". If you are selling high value timber, this method of sale often yields more income.

Note: Each method of sale has different implications concerning landowner liability, worker's compensation insurance, etc. It's important to understand them before proceeding.

Different Harvest Systems Available

Landowners are often confused about the type of harvest they should employ. Timber harvests are, at best, a compromise of well developed resource management goals, appropriate harvesting technology, and available forest product markets. Ideally, the type of harvest you choose is dictated by a sensible combination of your forest's needs and your management goals. This issue is further complicated by confusion about the quality of a timber harvest versus the quality of management accomplished through a timber harvest. Timber harvesting quality may be rated by factors such as the utilization of harvested trees, damage to remaining trees, proper layout of skid trails, and the way that log landings are left. A timber harvest might rate highly from an aesthetic perspective but be rated poorly from a sensible forest management perspective. Depending on the method of harvest, trees may be designated for removal by marking the individual trees with tree paint, marking the areas to be harvested with flagging, or a combination of the two.

Individual Tree Selection

Trees to be removed are selected and marked with tree paint to accomplish particular forest and wildlife management objectives. This is often referred to as an improvement cutting because one of the key objectives is an overall upgrading of forest quality and growing conditions by removing the lowest quality individual trees within the forest. The residual or remaining forest treated in this way has improved timber value and a relatively high stocking of trees overall.

Group Selection

Trees are marked and removed in small groups or patches to accomplish a particular management objective which might be regeneration of a particular species and/or wildlife habitat improvement.

Selective Cutting

This term is often used as a "catch all" for all types of partial cuttings. The Society of American Foresters defines it as an exploitation cutting and in many instances it is used to describe highgrading, liquidation harvests or diameter limit cuttings. This is in contrast to a selection cutting which has forest improvement as its primary objective. The point to keep in mind is "who's doing the selecting?".

Diameter Limit Cutting

In diameter limit cuttings, all trees above an established minimum diameter are harvested. While trees are left after a diameter limit cutting, they are most often the poorest trees in terms of health and quality. Many liquidation harvests are in fact diameter limit cuttings. Most New Hampshire forests are in fact "even-aged", and small diameter trees are as old, although not as vigorous, as the larger stems. Diameter limit cuttings aren't usually regarded as wise, long-term, forest management options as they eventually cause a loss of stand vigor because the fastest growing trees are always taken first.

Clearcutting

Clearcutting harvests involve the complete or nearly complete removal of trees in a designated area. Clearcuts may be done in various shapes and sizes including patches and strips. While controversial, properly applied clearcutting is a useful forest and wildlife habitat management tool.

Highgrading

Highgrading is a harvest in which the best quality trees are removed. The remaining forest may have a "thinned" appearance but in fact usually has greatly reduced timber value and forest management potential. Genetically poorer trees are left to provide the future growing stock.

Liquidation

Liquidation harvests simply mean all merchantable forest products and hence the value associated with the timber asset of the land is removed. This is very often the net result of diameter limit cuttings. Clearcutting is also a liquidation harvest but, unlike diameter limit cuttings, the practice may very well be a valuable management practice to regenerate tree seedlings if it is completed with specific forest management goals in mind.

Why A Written Contract Is Necessary

A written contract is necessary for a timber sale so both buyer and seller have a clear understanding of the conditions under which the sale is made. The importance of a written contract can't be stressed enough as it protects both the buyer and seller and allows each to see in writing what is expected of them. Buyer-prepared contracts may not protect your interests or rights as a landowner. Well-written timber sale contracts clearly define conditions of the timber sale, the responsibilities for performance and expenses. Any designation or condition in a timber sale agreement which doesn't express whose responsibility and at whose expense the burden lies can lead to unnecessary disputes. In other words, put in writing who is responsible for what and who pays for it!

A well-written timber sale contract should clearly:

- identify buyer and seller
- provide the location of the parcel being harvested
- specify price to be paid, basis of measurement, method and schedule of payment
- specify time limits for the timber sale including seasonal limitations if applicable
- provide for seller granting access to the tract of land for purposes of harvesting
- specify compliance with all federal, state and local regulations
- assign responsibility for payment of the N.H. Yield Tax
- provide for protection of the residual stand with penalty provisions for unnecessary damage
- provide for restoration of skid trails and landings
- assign responsibility for payment of the N.H. Yield Tax
- describe utilization expectations of all trees harvested
- include a disclaimer by the seller for any liability for accident or injury to the buyer, his/her employees or equipment
- require written proof of adequate Worker's Compensation and Public Liability Insurance
- provide for prohibiting assignment of harvesting rights to another without written consent of the landowner
- provide for resolution of disputes, perhaps a third party agreeable to buyer and seller
- assign liability for property damage (buildings, fences, walls, power lines, etc.)
- assign liability for damages and suppression expenses if a forest fire occurs as a result of the harvesting operation or because of carelessness of those involved in the harvesting
- provide for immediate termination of the sales agreement if any of the provisions of the agreement are not adhered to
- specify when the title for timber harvested transfers (usually when the wood is paid for rather than when it is cut)

Timber sales are often unique. Therefore, provisions of each contract may vary. Licensed foresters are experienced in writing sound timber sale contracts to meet specific client and property requirements. UNH Cooperative Extension can provide sample timber sale contracts that are helpful if you are conducting a timber sale on your own. It may be advisable to obtain legal counsel when preparing a contract. Again, before proceeding with a timber sale, take time to become familiar with the process in order to make informed decisions. By all means, seek the services of a qualified licensed forester to assist you if you are unsure of any aspect of timber sale administration.

Directory of Licensed Foresters Providing Services to Forest Landowners in New Hampshire

The Directory of Licensed Foresters is an on line database of foresters licensed in New Hampshire who provide services to private landowners and others. It is maintained by UNH Cooperative Extension. The names are supplied by the State of NH Board of Licensure for Foresters. Additional information is provided by the listed foresters. This listing doesn't constitute an endorsement. When selecting a forester, one should follow common sense business procedures and practices. For more information on managing tree farms, timber sale guidelines and forestry in New Hampshire visit our Education links page at https://extension.unh.edu/fwt/dir/forestry_dir_edu.cfm.

Any qualified forester not listed or wishing to change their information, should contact forest.info@unh.edu, 1-800-444-8978, or Forestry Information Center, 131 Main St, 211 Nesmith Hall, Durham, NH 03824. Foresters can fill out an online request form to update their information by visiting our page at https://extension.unh.edu/fwt/dir/forestry_up_home.cfm.
