Sullivan County has the largest proportion of farm and forest open-space land in current use in New Hampshire. This past year, Extension forestry staff provided forest management consultation to 185 landowners during woodlot visits, and agriculture staff worked with farmers on financial analysis, benchmarking, labor management, succession planning and record keeping. Staff also supported planning to improve economic vibrancy and engaged youth through 4-H. Jacqui Baker, of the Greater Sullivan County Public Health Network at Dartmouth-Hitchcock, said, "Our community is rural, but the Youth and Family program maintains partnerships and plays an important role in the great work going on here, providing resources and guidance that better the wellness of our community."
